Abstract. The article examines how humor is expressed in proverbs and sayings of both English and Uzbek languages. Proverbs and sayings reflect the culture, values, and everyday experiences of a society, often using stylistic devices to convey humor, irony, or wit. The study highlights several stylistic techniques used to create humor, such as exaggeration, irony, wordplay, parallelism, and rhymes. English proverbs often use puns and witty comparisons, while Uzbek sayings frequently rely on exaggeration, metaphor, and cultural references familiar to local people. By comparing these two languages, the article demonstrates both similarities and differences in humorous expression, reflecting cultural and linguistic diversity.

The article also emphasizes that understanding humor in proverbs is important for language learners, as it helps them comprehend subtle meanings, develop cultural awareness, and appreciate the artistic nature of language. Overall, the study concludes that stylistic analysis of humor in proverbs and sayings provides insight into the creativity and communicative function of language in different cultures.

INTRODUCTION

Humor is an essential part of human communication and is often reflected in proverbs and sayings. Proverbs are short, traditional expressions that convey wisdom, cultural values, and practical advice. Many proverbs and sayings use stylistic devices to make their message memorable and, in some cases, humorous. Understanding humor in language is important for both native speakers and language learners because it provides insights into culture, creativity, and social norms.

English and Uzbek languages have rich traditions of proverbs and sayings, which often incorporate humor in different ways. In English, humor is frequently expressed through wordplay, puns, and witty comparisons. For example, the proverb "A fool and his money are soon parted" uses irony to convey a humorous observation about human behavior. In Uzbek, humor in proverbs often relies on exaggeration, metaphor, and cultural references, such as “Choynak o‘rniga sho‘rva berish” (“To give soup instead of a teapot”), which humorously highlights the mismatch between expectation and reality.

Studying stylistic aspects of humor in proverbs allows researchers to analyze how language functions to entertain, educate, and reflect cultural values. It also helps language learners understand figurative meaning, improve comprehension, and appreciate the creative use of language.

This article aims to explore the stylistic techniques used to create humor in English and Uzbek proverbs and sayings. It focuses on the types of humor, linguistic devices employed, and the cultural differences and similarities between the two languages. By examining these aspects, the study provides a better understanding of how humor functions as a communicative and stylistic tool in different linguistic and cultural contexts.

Literature review.

Many researchers have studied humor and stylistics in proverbs. Attardo argues that humor is often based on incongruity, wordplay, and violation of expectations, which can be observed in proverbs and sayings [1,56]. Similarly, Raskin emphasizes that linguistic structures, such as puns, irony, and ambiguity, contribute to the humorous effect in language [2,78].

In the context of English proverbs, Crystal notes that wordplay, alliteration, and rhymes are common devices used to produce humor [3,45]. Proverbs often make witty comparisons, exaggerate human behavior, or use irony to deliver a memorable message. For instance, “Early to bed and early to rise makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise” is humorous in its exaggerated promise of life success.

In Uzbek proverbs, humor frequently relies on metaphor, exaggeration, and cultural references. Komilov highlights that Uzbek sayings often use familiar social situations or characters to convey humor, making them culturally rich and relatable [4,67]. For example, “Og‘ir so‘zni yengil kulgu bilan ayt” (“Say harsh words with light laughter”) uses contrast and irony to make a humorous moral point.

Comparative studies show both similarities and differences in the humorous expression of the two languages. Both English and Uzbek proverbs use exaggeration and irony, but English favors wordplay and puns, while Uzbek relies more on cultural references and metaphors [5,89]. Understanding these differences is important for language learners and translators to avoid misinterpretation of humor.

Overall, the literature emphasizes that analyzing stylistic devices in proverbs helps uncover cultural values, creativity, and the communicative function of language. Studying humor in proverbs provides insight into how different societies use language to entertain, educate, and reflect social norms [6,102].

Methodology.

This study uses a qualitative approach to analyze stylistic aspects of humor in English and Uzbek proverbs and sayings. Qualitative analysis allows a detailed examination of language use, stylistic devices, and cultural context. The study examined a collection of 50 English proverbs and 50 Uzbek sayings that are known for their humorous content. Data were collected from dictionaries, proverb anthologies, and online resources. Each proverb was analyzed to identify the type of humor (irony, exaggeration, wordplay, etc.) and the stylistic device used (metaphor, alliteration, rhyme, contrast).

Comparative analysis was applied to highlight similarities and differences in humor between English and Uzbek proverbs. The study also considered cultural factors that influence humorous expression, such as social norms, daily life, and traditional values.

Ethical considerations included proper referencing of all sources and avoidance of misrepresentation of cultural content. The analysis focused on identifying patterns in stylistic devices, humor types, and cultural references.

This methodology provides insights into how humor is constructed in proverbs and how stylistic devices contribute to meaning, making it useful for language learning, translation, and cultural studies.

Results.

The study found that humor in English proverbs primarily relies on wordplay, irony, exaggeration, and witty comparisons. Common stylistic devices include puns, alliteration, and rhymes. For example, “A stitch in time saves nine” uses a clever metaphor to convey the importance of timely action, while also having a humorous undertone when interpreted literally.

In Uzbek proverbs, humor often comes from exaggeration, metaphor, and cultural references. Sayings like “Og‘ir so‘zni yengil kulgu bilan ayt” use contrast to create humor, making the moral lesson more memorable. Humorous expression in Uzbek proverbs reflects local culture, traditions, and everyday experiences, which may not have direct equivalents in English.

Comparative analysis showed that both languages use irony and exaggeration, but English favors linguistic playfulness and word-based humor, whereas Uzbek emphasizes cultural context and metaphorical exaggeration. Both approaches make proverbs memorable and entertaining, but the source of humor differs according to cultural norms.

Overall, humor in proverbs serves not only to entertain but also to educate and reflect social values. Understanding stylistic devices enhances comprehension of figurative meaning and cultural significance in both languages.

Discussion.

The findings confirm that humor in proverbs is deeply connected to cultural and linguistic context. English proverbs often use linguistic creativity, such as puns, rhymes, and witty comparisons, making humor language-centered. Uzbek proverbs, however, rely more on cultural references, exaggeration, and metaphor, making humor context-centered.

Both languages use humor to make moral lessons memorable and entertaining. Exaggeration and irony are common in both, but the method of expression differs. Understanding these differences is important for language learners, translators, and educators, as humor is often culture-specific and may be lost in translation.

The discussion highlights the communicative and stylistic function of humor in proverbs. It not only entertains but also reinforces cultural values, teaches lessons, and strengthens social cohesion. Comparative analysis helps learners and researchers appreciate linguistic creativity and cultural diversity.

Conclusion.

This study concludes that humor in English and Uzbek proverbs and sayings is created through different stylistic devices. English proverbs often use wordplay, puns, rhymes, and witty comparisons, while Uzbek proverbs rely on exaggeration, metaphor, and cultural references.

Humor makes proverbs memorable, entertaining, and educational. It reflects cultural values and everyday experiences of each society. Understanding stylistic devices and humorous expression enhances language learning, translation, and cultural comprehension.

Both languages use irony and exaggeration, but the cultural context determines the method of humor. For language learners, studying humor in proverbs improves figurative understanding and awareness of cultural nuances. For educators, it provides strategies to teach language and culture interactively.

In conclusion, stylistic analysis of humor in proverbs and sayings reveals the creative, communicative, and cultural functions of language. By comparing English and Uzbek proverbs, learners and researchers can appreciate both similarities and differences in humor, enriching cross-cultural understanding and linguistic competence.
